Catalog Course Description

An introduction to the study of films reflecting the concerns and attitudes of ethnic, racial, gender, and disability groups that historically have been under-represented, distorted, or marginalized in mainstream commercial cinema. This course examines cinematic depictions of African-Americans, Latinos, Asian-Americans, Native Americans, women, LGBTQ+, and the disabled. 54 lecture hours.

Course Objectives

- recognize the ideological assumptions at work within a particular motion picture
- understand that every nation has a characteristic way of looking at life, a set of values that are typical of a given culture, and that the movies of a particular country reflect those values
- explain the role of "The Other," a counter-tradition that is dialectically opposed to what might be considered the dominant strain in a culture
- discuss how culturally diverse countries like the United States contain many subcultures that coexist within the dominant ideology
- analyze the tensions between the dominant culture and the values of a minority community that are dramatized in films with an ethnic slant
- appreciate the unique concerns of the various subcultures that traditionally have been under-represented, distorted, or marginalized in mainstream American cinema
